constantly examined in the context of the Scripture. Here is the story of a family which can well serve as a prototype in Mennonite family history. The close relationships in family ties and interresponsibilities are classic.

The relationship of a minister's family to the spiritual needs of the broader church community is a unique example of deep devotion to Christ and the community of believers. Father Neufeld, an Elder in the Mennonite Brethren fellowship, personifies the ideal of a shepherd in the reports on his itinerant ministry. The caring dimension of his ministry finds expression in the house visitations which appear as central to his assignment as a spiritual shepherd.

The scope of Elder Neufeld's ministry is astonishing. With no academic training he serves as a prototype of a self-educated Mennonite minister. The "Bible prechange" (Bible Conferences) to which frequent references are made appear to be a major source to provide spiritual nurture, equipping him and other ministers of his day for the sacred assignment. (The latter an essential key to the vitality of the spiritual life in Anabaptist history.) The political events which uprooted him in Russia, the immigration to Canada, and the required re-orientation in the North American scene seemingly do not affect the fervor of his spiritual ministry.

Especially touching is the expressed concern for family and friends who were left behind in Russia after the 1923 immigration. The concern for them supersedes the personal hardships arising from the limited economic resources of an immigrant family.

Abraham H. Neufeld is to be congratulated for the work in translating and editing the diary to make it accessible to the wider Mennonite community. This prototype for Christian and Mennonite family life and ministry needs to be read by those who are concerned for the continued effectiveness of the legacy entrusted to the present and future generations of Mennonites.
